Silk comes from the cocoon of silkworms. These silkworms are only about an inch long when they are hatched from their eggs. They eat a lot of mulberry leaves and soon become very fat and about three inches long. When they are six weeks old they begin to spin a silk thread. They wind it round and round their bodies until they are fully covered in a case of a silken thread. This case is called a cocoon. The silken thread in the cocoon is used to make silk cloth. This thread was first used to make cloth by the Chinese about four hundred years ago. Today silk is produced mainly in China , India and Japan
