Test 15

Read the following passage and answer the questions given below.

Cable TV began in the 1950s in the United States and Canada as a means of obtaining better reception in remote rural and crowded urban areas, where mountains and high - rise housing might interfere with terrestrial (airwave) transmission. Instead of individual TV aerials picking up signals from the nearest relay station, the pictures were fed by coaxial cable directly into receivers, either underground or via poles. The cable provides protection from interference, helping to improve picture quality.

Coaxial cables can carry much more signal information than the airwaves, thus solving the problem of spectrum shortage that plagued terrestrial broadcasting. In the United States and increasingly in Europe, cable has meant many more channels being made available to the public - though at an extra cost. A monthly subscription fee has to be paid, in order to activate a device that allows the TV receiver to tune into the cable channels. Firms are keen to introduce more "pay - per - view" systems, so that charges can be made for watching individual events, such as a boxing match, or a new film.

In Britain, cable was relatively unimportant until the mid - 1990s (when firms allowed to install cable systems capable of combining TV and telephone Services) Instead of the biggest new force in British broadcasting in the early 1990s was satellite TV, in the form of BSKY B, launched by media magnate Rupert Murdoch. Like cable system elsewhere, this works on a subscription basis. In Asia too, satellite is an important new feature. Small local networks are run by entrepreneurs who invest in a small satellite dish and then charge customers for relaying programmes on to them by cable. Programming is mainly provided by Rupert Murdoch's Hong Kong - based Star TV, which charges high advertising rates for companies to reach the huge audiences these new services attract.
